2. Include your full name and contact details in the email – not on the script.
3. In the email give a brief description (max. 120 words) of the setting, background, characters in your script; and anything else you consider relevant.
4. Pay the €10 entry fee – to cover administration costs

Some Thoughts from Festival Director, Garrett Keogh

Start with Passion. Something, anything you feel strongly about. Waiting with the phone to your ear while an endless recording says 'We'll be with you shortly...' The constraints of the Lockdown, the handling of the pandemic. The joys of love, of swimming in the sea. The pains, the blames, the unexpected discoveries...

Characters. Who are they, where have they come from, what have they done, what do they want to do, need to do – and how are they going about doing that...? How do your character/s deal with change, how they react to, and how they affect one another. What about external circumstances? What is happening to them right now as we watch? Are they waiting on one number in the Lotto, or on the Gardaí to knock on the door?

In any script, but particularly in something as short as this, grab our attention. And do it quickly. Hold it, twist it, surprise it. Make us laugh, intrigue us, make us feel.

Be open. Be prepared to astonish yourself, and see where the writing takes you.

Scripts are not just dialogue – or in this case, duologues. There can be monologue; and duologue; as well as mixes of both. Characters can talk directly to the audience. Or to themselves. There can be silence, action, mime...

This format does not allow offstage characters, but stage directions can be read to indicate off-stage sound effects. For example, the happy sounds of a party offstage, while someone sits alone outside... And a simple line of stage direction can tell us if your script is set on Mars, in ER, on a beach in Portugal; in the distant past, or in a thousand light years from now.
